Additionally, I view CIA participation in the Brookings Advanced Studies Program (and other such programs) as a must, to be used to maximum advantage. Beyond the value to our individual managers and therefore to our organizational effectiveness, the very act of participation helps break our relative isolation from the rest of Government (outside the Intelligence Community) and affords us the opportunity to clarify issues related to CIA responsibilities. Unwelcome, generally unfavorable publicity in recent years has given our Agency an "image problem." By sending articulate participants to gatherings of this sort, we demonstrate that we are unafraid to respond to the legitimate concerns of well meaning critics. It is a low-key, and therefore acceptable, way to build a more favorable image in influential circles.
